Up-regulated expression of cyclooxygenase-2 in the spinal cord of rats with Freund's adjuvant-induced chronic inflammatory pain. Previous studies demonstrated the up-regulation of cyclooxygenase-2 (COX-2) expression in the spinal cord of rats with neuropathic pain. The present study was undertaken to determine whether there was a similar up-regulation of COX-2 in rats with inflammatory pain. Intraperitoneal injection of Freund's complete adjuvant into the hind paw of rats on days 1 and 5 resulted in substantial mechanical hyperalgesia, accompanied by swelling of the injected paw and minimal thermal hyperalgesia. It was demonstrated that there was an increase in COX-2 immunoreactivity, mainly in the superficial and deep laminae of the ipsilateral spinal cord, in contrast to the minimal immunoreactivity observed in the corresponding region of vehicle-treated animals. This increase in COX-2 immunoreactivity was accompanied by a marked increase in COX-2 mRNA expression. The COX-2 immunoreactivity was localized in both spinal cord cells and fibers. In cells, the immunoreactivity was clearly observed in glial cells, not in neurons. In the spinal cord fibers,

COX-2 immunoreactivity was markedly increased in the ipsilateral side of the spinal cord. This up-regulation of COX-2 expression in the spinal cord is associated with the development of inflammatory pain.1 f678ea9f9e
